for the damaging effect of ADAMTS-13 deficiency on capillary health. The flow of capillaries into the alveolar spaces is a fundamental process of the capillary-alveolar unit, and both ADAMTS-13 and VWF have established importance in this process [pone.0112973-Scott1]-[pone.0112973-Scott2]. To further investigate mechanisms through which ADAMTS-13 deficiency influences the alveolar microvasculature, we developed a model of sustained vascular injury using the pulmonary arterial endothelial cell line PA-EC-D1. In vitro, we observed that endothelial cells derived from ADAMTS-13^{-/-} mice consistently exhibited a higher level of apoptosis than those derived from WT mice, in response to sustained VEGF stimulation. On the contrary, we did not observe any significant differences between the two groups in terms of necrosis. This suggests that ADAMTS-13 modulates apoptosis, but not necrosis, in our in vitro model. These findings are in agreement with a previous report showing ADAMTS-13's role in vascular remodeling [pone.0112973-Liao1]. Neutrophils, monocytes and macrophages, all of which are increased in ADAMTS-13^{-/-} mice, are known to be involved in vascular remodeling [pone.0112973-Liao1]. It is possible that ADAMTS-13 also acts as an anti-apoptotic factor by modulating the numbers of vascular cells involved in vascular remodeling. We further showed that the anti-apoptotic effect of ADAMTS-13 was due to its ability to cleave caspase-3 and inhibit apoptosis-associated caspase-3 activity. Similarly, previous studies have reported that ADAMTS-13 inhibits vascular endothelial cell apoptosis in a mouse model of hyperoxia-induced lung injury [pone.0112973-Cho1], [pone.0112973-Lee2]. These findings are consistent with the hypothesis that ADAMTS-13 is protective in pulmonary injury, likely by inhibiting apoptosis. The evidence for increased apoptosis in ADAMTS-13^{-/-} mice, however, does not explain why ADAMTS-13 deficiency leads to alveolar septal
